betsmiljöverket, the Swedish Work Environment Authority, which is primarily tasked with ensuring compliance with legislation. However, as from 1 June 2018, they will be able to use the services of a new work environment agency, Myndighet för arbetsmiljökunskap, which will be based in Gävle and which will help them implement measures relating to the quality of the working environment, and will be responsible for assessing these measures.

For more information: exedsse.se (Stockholm School of Economics website)

As a trailblazer for both gender equality and work-life balance, Sweden is renowned for the numerous measures that it has rolled out. The flagship initiative is the 480-day paid parental leave, which may be shared between both parents. The scheme’s appeal is also heightened by the tax relief that is granted to parents who share their paid parental leave equally.

Unlike Japan and many Western countries, working more than the statutory weekly working hours is not perceived as a feat in Sweden but as a warning that the workload should be reviewed, or even as a sign of inefficiency. Only 1% of the workforce work overtime and, together with the Netherlands, this is one of the lowest rates in OECD countries.

The philosophy of “lagom”, which translates as “just the right amount”, is part of Swedish culture and has effortlessly graduated to the workplace.

The goal is to significantly lower stress levels by introducing ways to find balance in all aspects of people’s everyday lives. Besides regulations dealing with family life, working time reorganisation has been mainstreamed with around 60% of workers enjoying flexitime and/or teleworking arrangements, some 20% more than the European average.

“Lagom” is epitomised by a particular leadership method that is used in ten of the country’s largest firms. It is centred on a responsible approach from managers who “are coached to not burn out their staff by planning in advance and prioritising better; many company decisions are made collaboratively but staff are encouraged to leave early on occasion. By feeling trusted, they are likely to go above and beyond at the times the business most needs it”. This involves true teamwork with all employees being more informed for the decision making process.

The quality of the working environment is a mainstay of the Swedish strategy and an organisation has been set up, endowed with its own resources, to ensure that this quality is subject to ongoing improvements.

Forte is a research council founded in 2011 which has been advising the government on wellbeing and health in the workplace since 2013. In late 2016, it unveiled a ten-year national research programme.

In respect of operational considerations, public and private sector employers have access to Ar-

Monthly focus: “lagom” or the Swedish model applied to the quality of the working environment

In this issue:

- Monthly focus: “lagom” or the Swedish model applied to the quality of the working environment
- HR news - Civil service, HR Policy, innovation and innovation
- HR news - Recruitment, training and skills
- HR news - Senior management and leadership, digitalisation
- HR news - Social dialogue and quality of the working environment
- Private sector: Orange, the advance guard for the “right to disconnect” in major French firms
- Zoom in on: “Partnership for Change”, the Slovenian public-private sector exchange programme
HR news from France, Europe and around the world

Civil service, HR policy and innovation

A framework for optimal HR management structures in Australia
The Australian Public Service Commission (APSC) has established a new framework to improve the effectiveness of organisational layers in the agencies. Developed by the Deputy Secretaries Efficiency Working Group, the framework lays down five robust HR notions: hierarchy restricted to five organisational layers, delegation of decision making, process streamlining, innovation and adaptability, and consistent classification of jobs.
For more information: apsc.gov.au

Launch of the final stage of the “Blueprint 2020” reform in Canada
A Public Service Renewal Results Plan represents the last stage in public sector reform. Three outcomes are being aimed for: a Public Service that enables new and existing public servants to be in the right place, at the right time, doing the right things, that has efficient and effective processes, tools, practices and organisational structures and that embodies a healthy workplace. Eight specific actions are being taken to achieve these outcomes, and their implementation and progress will be tracked and reported back to employees and Canadians using indicators.
For more information: canada.ca (in French)

Personal data concerning moves to the private sector is being put online in Spain
When they move to the private sector, Spain’s high-ranking civil servants have to inform the Conflicts of Interest Office (which reports to the Ministry of Finance and Civil Service) of the duties that they will take up. Since early February, the government has been publishing personal information regarding authorisations issued by the civil service on its transparency portal.
For more information: transparencia.gob.es (in Spanish)

Recruitment, training and skills

A campaign to attract talented individuals to the German civil service
In an attempt to overcome recruitment difficulties, the federal government is launching an awareness-raising “second step” campaign aimed at the highest echelons of the private sector. Applicants are not subject to any age limit and employers must give equal consideration to internal and external candidates, and select them solely on the basis of their qualifications and experience.
For more information: bundesregierung.de (in German)

AXA supplements its training system
As a business with a culture of learning, AXA is striving to provide its staff worldwide with training resources while giving them more autonomy to map out their career paths. These massive online open courses (MOOCs), which are flexible and which lead to qualifications, are supplementing existing options. An initial review points to significant take-up (20% more certifications of course completion).
For more information: axa.com (in French)

Workshops to foster career development in the Netherlands
The EC O&P (Expert Center Organization and Personnel) of the Ministry of the Interior and Kingdom Relations has set up collective workshops to prepare staff who so wish for changing positions within the civil service. Four topics are available: building a business network, enhancing candidate profiles, presenting organisational structures from an “employer brand” standpoint and effective communication within a department.
For more information: motainingen.nl (in Dutch)
Senior management and leadership, digitalisation

Variable-term probationary periods for supervisors and managers in the United States

Amongst the measures contained in the new Ensuring a Qualified Civil Service (EQUALS) Act is the option of extending the probationary period of newly-appointed senior executives to two years. Federal agencies are now able to use this additional period to offer extra training and to conduct a proper assessment before granting (or not) career employee status.
For more information: govttrack.us

The “confidence-based management” strategy at Grand Paris Sud Est Avenir

This local authority in the South-East of the Greater Paris region has introduced a ground-breaking management strategy for which the buzzwords are innovate, experiment, listen and involve. The novelties of the new organisational structure include participatory organisation charts (38% of employees’ suggestions were used), managerial coordination systems and inverted management committees to upend the hierarchical structure.
For more information: sudestavenir.fr (in French)

An assessment of officials based on their use of evidence in the United Kingdom

At the five-year anniversary of the What Works Network, the government is acting on the recommendation of its national What Works adviser, David Halpern, and is set to introduce “evidence” criteria into the assessment of officials. To this end, a dedicated Cabinet Office team is working on defining competencies that include a scientific approach and use of research outcomes.
For more information: civilserviceworld.com

Publication of a European guide to tackling psychosocial risks at work

As the first guide produced by the social partners of the central government administrations of 21 Member States and of other European countries, it provides insight into psychosocial risks. It is the fruit of a project that was co-managed by the Directorate General for the Administration and the Civil Service (DGAFP) between 2015 and 2017 and it recommends an overall strategic approach encompassing both individual and collective, as well as corrective, measures, which will all be supported as part of social dialogue.
For more information: fonction-publique.gouv.fr (in French)

Analysis of a survey into happiness in the workplace

A paper written by seven academics has highlighted - based on data from a survey into working conditions conducted by the French Directorate for the Coordination of Research, Studies and Statistics (DARES) – the score on the World Health Organization’s well-being index depending on the worker profiles defined by the authors. For instance, tension in relations with superiors reduces this score to 10.3 from an average of 15.6.
For more information: pressesdesmines.com (in French)

Tripartite agreement on public sector digitalisation signed in Norway

An agreement on public sector digitalisation has been signed by the Ministry of Local Government and Modernisation, the Union of Municipal and General Employees (Fagforbundet) and the Association of Local and Regional Authorities. It commits the three partners to engage in constructive social dialogue and active worker participation in shaping the processes and policies that will accompany the roll-out of future digital services.
For more information: world-psi.org

Social dialogue and quality of the working environment

“Establish a professional community centred on the effectiveness of the service provided and wellbeing in the workplace”

“Consideration for municipal workers’ know-how and experience are key to achieve quality digital services”
Private sector: Orange, the advance guard for the “right to disconnect” in major French firms

A little over a year ago, the French telecoms operator signed an agreement on “disconnect” with three unions representing 58.5% of staff. It was the first of the French CAC 40 companies to execute such an agreement. Four commitments are enshrined in this three-year arrangement, one of which is a guaranteed “right to disconnect” for employees including - and this was also a first - during working hours.

Since 1 January 2017, firms with more than 50 employees must “initiate talks on the right to disconnect and implement digital application use-regulation procedures with an eye to ensuring respect for rest and leave time, as well as personal and family life”. However, in practice, these measures are difficult to apply. A July 2017 Ifop poll revealed that almost 80% of executives consult and reply to business-related emails during their free time, and this trend has been rising sharply since 2015.

To address this issue, ANACT (National Agency for the Improvement of Working Conditions) offers an online instrument, that was designed in conjunction with a trade association and that is intended to help the stakeholders assess the state of play in companies in respect of quality of the working environment as part of digitalisation.

For more information: orange.com (in French)

1 Article 55 of the Act of 8 August 2016

Zoom in on: “Partnership for Change”, the Slovenian public-private sector exchange programme

The idea came to Boris Koprivnikar, the Slovenian Deputy Prime Minister and Public Administration Minister, when he met with young Americans during a trip to the US. It involved setting up a bold and innovative exchange programme between his civil servants and private sector workers designed to break stereotypes, share best practices and move boundaries to show that cooperation between the public administration and business in a new, different and innovative manner, works.

In 2015, the Ministry of Public Administration signed a partnership agreement with the American Chamber of Commerce in Slovenia (AmCham Slovenia) for an initial exchange involving 27 employees. Buoyed up by positive feedback which provided a substantial boost for the public sector’s image, the programme was both renewed for a second round and gradually extended to include other ministries and more Slovenian and international companies based in the country. The number of participants has increased five-fold over the last three years and the project now counts eight ministries and 46 businesses.

During these annual exchange rounds, mixed groups were formed. By learning more about their respective domains, participants work together to come up with proposals for innovative solutions to one of the five common challenges identified for the Partnership for Change:

- Cooperation across the ministries
- Employee motivation
- Slovenian national brand (I Feel Slovenia)
- E-public services
- Skills of the 21st century

From the outset, the project has been supported by the highest government echelons. Prime Minister Miro Cerar describes it as “an example of a future co-habitation model in modern Slovenia”. He also emphasised the excellent collaboration between two important players in society which encourages further partnerships between the economy and state administration.

The Partnership for Change programme has already begun to be acknowledged outside Slovenia. In 2016, it was awarded the Creative Network Award. In 2017, it was selected, from over 150 applications, to be presented at the World Government Summit, that was organised by the OECD’s Observatory of Public Sector Innovation and held in Dubai.

For more information: miju.gov.si

www.fonction-publique.gouv.fr

Directorate-General for Administration and the Civil Service (DGAFP)
Publication Manager: Thierry LE GOFF
Managing Editor: Xavier MAIRE
Editor-in-chief: Jean-Marc CHNEIDER
Publication Coordinator: Jean-François ADRIAN
Editorial Team of the present issue: Jean-François ADRIAN, Mathilde DOMENACH-SENECAT
Layout and graphic design: HR Policies Benchmarking European and International Expertise Unit
© DGAFP 2018 - N° ISSN : 2606-7528 / Subscription / Contact

The information in this document does not reflect the views of the DGAFP. This document may be reproduced in whole or in part provided the source is mentioned. Pursuant to the French Data Protection Act no. 78-17 of 6 January 1978, you are entitled to access and correct your personal information. To do so, you should send an e-mail to contact-visionrh.dgaf@finances.gouv.fr or write to DGAFP – 139, rue de Bercy - 75012 Paris, France.